Today, the fossil fuel companies that dominate the global energy market are the same ones that fund climate denial efforts, obscuring the truth about the scale of climate change. These companies also profit from the current fossil fuel system. They are not only responsible for the majority of the emissions that continue to build up in the atmosphere, but they are the primary funders of climate deniers, including the aforementioned Koch brothers and Exxon. Thus, as the primary producers and profiteers of the status quo, fossil fuel companies are our enemy in the fight to address climate change. To fight these companies and support the transition to an emissions-free economy, we need a renewable energy transition that is funded by capitalism, and one that makes the fossil fuel companies pay a price for the climate chaos they have helped generate. What Would a Just Transition Look Like? A just transition is one in which fossil fuel workers are given the tools, education, and new industries to support themselves and their families, rather than see their livelihoods destroyed by the transitioning industries. To ensure such a transition is done right, it must be overseen by the public sector and people's movements. This means that the energy transition in the U.S. must be led by the workers and communities most affected by it, who would be in charge of the process. The U.S. Civil Rights Act of 1964 laid the groundwork for the nation's first major clean energy transition, including employment protections for the workers who dismantled the old industrial system, and is widely seen as a model for just transition efforts today. It was the Civil Rights Movement, after all, which was instrumental in showing how the U.S. should address racial discrimination. Today, it would be more than fair to ask the companies of the fossil fuel industry to similarly act as agents of transformation, providing jobs and fair wages to the workers affected by their contribution to climate change. A just transition would give fossil fuel workers important tools, including: Just Transition funds; for both new investment in renewable energy and retraining and employment for those displaced.
